In the rarefied high mountain Italian Alps, the son of a banker, a young artist, son of a watchmaker and the most beautiful young woman on earth meet unexpectedly. Connected through a nearly incredible tangle of curious and shared history they decide, while the banker's family sits for a family portrait, to summit the Peak surrounding this great Hotel. Jack Dempsey, one of many family members, arrives for a summer vacation and meets Henri, a young portrait painter earning tuition by his summer efforts. Hannah, a childhood neighbor of Jack, knowing this old NYC family with whom her parents are friendly, all vacationing at the White Hotel, seeks to discover his whereabouts.

Finding Henri in her search they are attracted to each other immediately. In time Henri begins to sketch her portrait which, throughout the story impresses her, Jack and his father. Magical and reflective of Henri's most profound attraction to this lovely princess, the lives and stories of these three youths become increasingly intertwined concluding with a plan for a day hike to Summit and return by dark.

Excited and in high glee, outfitted by the stable boy and leaving at first light, before noon realize they are not only lost, but the weather has turned and they are likely best to return to the hotel. Blue warm and forgiving skies turn, cold, menacing and disintegrating quickly deliver a white out squall stopping even their retreat. Henri takes Jack's priceless watch apart to fashion a compass out of the parts and Hannah directs their construction of a small yurt to get them out of the wind. Freezing and fearful of hypothermia, realizing fully the extent of their trouble, they set out.

Fearing darkness and a night on the frozen peaks or death, they make their way to near calamity, stumbling to a three thousand foot cliff but in so doing find the markers which properly navigated may finally lead them home.

The White Hotel, a magnificent structure in an extraordinary environment allows a quintessentially human peak into the minds and hearts of young men and women coming of age.
